North Korea America cannot stop North Korea from building long-range nuclear missiles. But it can deter it from using them: leader, page 10. The missile test is ringing alarm bells in Washington, page 33. Can America and China escape Thucydides's trap? Page 73. From friendship to friction in a few easy steps, page 37

The war against Islamic State No one knows what will happen after the jihadists lose Mosul and Raqqa. That is alarming: leader, page 14. Even before the battle is won, hopes of a fresh dawn for Iraq are fading, page 41

Ageing To get the most out of longer lives, a new age category is needed: leader, page 12. Older populations could be a boon rather than a curse. See our special report after page 40

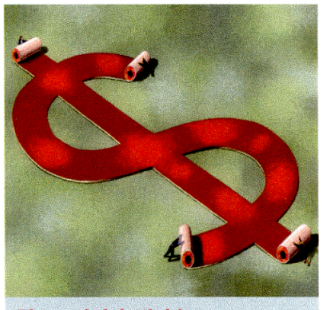
Brexit and the City As the clock runs down, banks and other financial firms must make plans—even if they don't know what for, page 61. A silly spat about seafood shows the sort of compromises that Brexit will force, page 50. It could entail a hard landing for low-cost carriers, page 56



Financial derisking Swingeing fines have made banks too risk-averse. It is time to rethink anti-money-laundering rules: leader, page 10. A crackdown on financial crime has led global banks to run from risk. That has caused problems for swathes of deserving customers, page 53

Detroit's car firms Motown's giants try to show that anything Silicon Valley can do, they can do better: Schumpeter, page 60
